Marzano-Lesnevich argues that writing is a social act, and that our writing is shaped by our relationships with others. She draws on her own experiences as a writer and writing teacher, as well as the work of other writers and scholars, to explore the ways in which relationships can influence our writing.

Towards Creative Relational Inquiry is divided into three parts. The first part, "The Relational Writer," explores the different ways in which relationships can shape our writing. Marzano-Lesnevich discusses the role of family, friends, lovers, mentors, and writing groups in the writing process. She also explores the ways in which our relationships with our readers can influence our writing.

The second part of the book, "The Relational Writing Process," offers practical advice for writers on how to incorporate relational inquiry into their writing process. Marzano-Lesnevich provides exercises and prompts to help writers explore their relationships with others and with their writing. She also discusses the importance of collaboration and feedback in the writing process.

The third part of the book, "The Relational Writing Life," explores the ways in which writing can shape our relationships with others. Marzano-Lesnevich argues that writing can help us to connect with others, to build community, and to make a difference in the world. She also discusses the challenges of writing about relationships, and offers advice for writers on how to navigate these challenges.

Towards Creative Relational Inquiry is an essential read for any writer who is interested in exploring the relational aspects of the writing process. Marzano-Lesnevich's insights and advice will help writers to develop a more nuanced understanding of their writing and to create more meaningful and powerful work.
