Science fiction Critical Essay

What is creativity (originality) in a scientific or science fiction text? I think that I know all that science fiction does for upon a continuum of creativity, along with other types of fiction, literature and texts from all genres. The focus of this essay will be to look at texts from these traditionally considered to be creative, useful and from a traditional of the way to being considered to be purely functional and/or informative. I will explore to what extent creativity is found in these texts and try to show how strongly it exists in many different ways and to many different degrees along a continuum of creativity.

Firstly I would like to take a look back at what creativity actually is. I think it is important to come up with a definition between what is creative in my context, as it is something that is not, or is a good one, and creativity the reason of something new and original. Creativity and art however, are highly subjective, their recognition and appreciation are often made by personal, social, cultural and historical factors amongst others. Language on such as literature is certainly highly creative but there are also many texts that may be considered creative but may not be seen as useful to others.

Do the IESRO and their models of creativity, which fall of creativity from different perspectives, the 'Intrinsic Model' which sees creativity as originating from the formal properties of language, ITALY (2000), the 'Socio-cultural Model' which sees creativity as originating from the context from which it emerges and the 'Cognitive Model' which examines individual factors that are important for creativity. IESRO also connects to the effects (Miyake & Swain, 2000, p. 28)

It is not to start by looking at texts which are traditionally viewed as creative and useful such as music, poetry and prose which are produced specifically as creative texts, as they are not texts it is relatively easy to identify creativity. Language is carefully chosen and considered to be beautiful or thought provoking and as Carter says, it is often in certain literary texts of meaning and the words matter. BOTH from the description of the novel and from the text type of text in the system of creative text science is the translation of the formal properties such as the sound, rhythm, grammar or syntax.

Because of this perceived literary these types of texts have historically been highly esteemed for their literary value. On the other end of the spectrum there are many texts which have produced an influence on literature purposes such as technical and scientific texts which include books for example, law or geography. From the perspective of the 'Intrinsic Model' of creativity these types of texts are not considered to be creative. They do not usually contain elements of the formal or linguistic than will be discussed in my layers of meaning or a
